CAN STATE CONSTITUTIONS BLOCK THE WORKERS’ COMPENSATION RACE TO THE BOTTOM?*

Robert F. Williams†

TABLE OF CONTENTS

INTRODUCTION........................................................................................................... 1082
I. THE RACE TO THE BOTTOM ........................................................................... 1085
II. CONSTITUTIONALIZATION OF WORKERS’ COMPENSATION .................. 1086
III. SELECTED STATES ......................................................................................... 1098
   A. Florida ............................................................................................................ 1098
   B. Ohio .............................................................................................................. 1107
   C. Oklahoma ..................................................................................................... 1111
IV. MAJORITARIAN JUDICIAL REVIEW ....................................................... 1114
V. HORIZONTAL FEDERALISM ......................................................................... 1115
VI. INTERNATIONAL HUMAN RIGHTS NORMS ........................................ 1116
CONCLUSION ....................................................................................................... 1116

The enactment of workmen’s compensation legislation occasioned one of the nation’s great battles over judicial review of reform legislation. As we have seen, the enactment of nineteenth-century tort reform legislation led to relatively few cases striking down legislation. But the enactment beginning

* This is an expanded version of a talk given at a symposium entitled “The Demise of the Grand Bargain: Compensation for Injured Workers in the 21st Century,” at Rutgers Law School in Camden, New Jersey on September 23, 2016. I received a modest fee for the lecture and this Article. It did not affect my views.

I want to express a debt of gratitude to Professor Michael C. Duff of the University of Wyoming Law School. His work was instrumental in bringing me “up to speed” on the developing “crisis” in worker's compensation, together with the background of these issues. See Michael C. Duff, Worse Than Pirates or Prussian Chancellors: A State’s Authority to Opt-Out of the Quid Pro Quo, 17 MARQ. BEN. & SOC. WEL. L. REV. 123 (2016). I also want to acknowledge invaluable research assistance from Jesse Harris, a 2017 graduate of Rutgers Law School, and David Batista, one of Rutgers Law School’s research librarians.

† Distinguished Professor of Law, Rutgers Law School; Director, Center for State Constitutional Studies, https://statecon.camden.rutgers.edu.
in 1910 of workmen's compensation legislation (as today's gender-neutral workers' compensation statutes were then known) led several of the nation's courts to strike down the new compensation programs. The result was a political crisis for some of the nation's leading state courts, the New York Court of Appeals chief among them.1

* * * *

Presently, I think most people in most states would recognize a moral duty for a state to provide some means by which a victim of workplace injury could be compensated. However, now, as in the past, competitive economic pressures may tempt employers to avoid the responsibility of compensating workers for injuries sustained in productive activity. Even a handful of employers without scruples might easily initiate a race to the bottom "to force the moral sentiment pervading any trade down to the level of that which characterizes the worst man who can maintain himself in it."2

INTRODUCTION

All American law students are made aware of the "Grand Bargain" that led to the advent of workers' compensation systems for workplace injuries by the time they finish their class in torts. This major legal reform eliminated employers' common law defenses of contributory negligence, assumption of the risk, and the fellow servant rule, in return for injured workers giving up their uncertain common law tort remedies for certain, but reduced, compensation. The details of this bargain were much more complex than this simple description, and varied state to state, but are beyond the scope of this Article.3 Professor

3. Work accident cases would no longer get bogged down in litigating thorny questions of fault or arcane questions about superior servants or different departments. Instead, injured employees would be compensated for virtually all injuries arising out of and in the course of their work. Damages would not be at Michael Duff has described the intermediate, unsuccessful steps leading up to the Grand Bargain. These included statutory modifications to the common law defenses, employer-purchased insurance, and employee cooperative insurance, among other experiments. In the end, Professors Price Fishback and Shawn Kantor concluded, as a number of others have, that employees, employers, and insurance carriers all saw the adoption of workers' compensation as to their mutual benefit:

In this article we show that the adoption of workers' compensation was not the result of employers' or workers' "capturing" the legislation to secure benefits at the expense of the other. Nor can the adoption of workers' compensation simply be attributed to the success of Progressive Era social reformers' demanding protective legislation. The legislation was enacted so rapidly across the United States in the 1910s because most members of the key economic interest groups with a stake in the legislation anticipated benefits from moving from employers' liability to workers' compensation.

It became clear that workplace accidents were a consequence of the rise of industrialization, and that the cost of compensating them should become part of the cost of doing business, much of which should be passed on to the consuming public. Notably, in the early years of workers' compensation, workers (at least nonunionized workers) "bought" some of their coverage through reduced wage rates.

the discretion of a jury or designed to make the injured employee whole, as in the law of torts, but would instead be scheduled at one-half or two-thirds the injured employees [sic] lost wages, plus medical costs. The result would be a kind of rough-justice in any one case, splitting the difference as between employers and employees. In particular cases, employers might be required to compensate injuries for which few reasonable observers would have held them responsible. And in other cases, injured employees would not be made whole as they would have been under the law of torts. But in the aggregate, these cases would wash one another out for a kind of systemic (if not individualized) justice.

5. Id.
7. Id. at 314, 331.
There is, however, a movement afoot in the country to further erode the workplace-injury compensation programs that formed one-half of the Grand Bargain: the Race to the Bottom. The ongoing litigation over the erosion of workers' compensation benefits in the states presents a moving target with new legislative and judicial developments coming at a rapid pace. Increasingly, lawyers, employers, and insurance carriers are arguing that injured workers are sometimes entitled to no or inadequate compensation. For example, in a recent Oklahoma Supreme Court case the court summarized the arguments:

Employer also argues on appeal petitioner has no right to file either a workers' compensation claim or seek a common-law remedy in a District Court. Employer asserts petitioner has no legal right or remedy to receive any type of compensation or medical care from her employer in any form. Employer argues petitioner has no right to an opportunity to prove her claim of injury before any court or any administrative agency. Employee argues her employer is making an unconstitutional application of workers' compensation statutes.

***

Employee argues that when the workers' compensation statutes were originally created in several States a grand bargain was created . . . . Employee cites to forty-two (42) provisions of the current workers' compensation scheme and argues that (1) workers' compensation remedies are inadequate, (2) the grand bargain is violated, and (3) the order denying her workers' compensation benefits should be reversed.8

Many workers' compensation lawyers, on both sides, have not seen themselves as "constitutional lawyers." Maybe they did not like constitutional law in law school. However, they are now being called on to raise, or defend against, constitutional arguments concerning statutory workers' compensation provisions. This can be a new area of law for them, requiring, among other things, understanding their own

---

8. Torres v. Seaboard Foods, LLC, 373 P.3d 1057, 1062, 1064–65, 1079 (Okla. 2016). There has also been an issue concerning state workers' compensation statutes' total exclusion of classes of employees, such as farmworkers, from coverage. The New Mexico Supreme Court recently declared this exclusion unconstitutional on state equal protection grounds. Rodriguez v. Brand W. Dairy, 378 P.3d 13 (N.M. 2016). For a listing of cases on this issue, see id. at 66 n.5 (Nakamura, J., dissenting).
state constitutions (which "are low-visibility"), the differences between state and federal constitutional law, and the requirements of preserving constitutional arguments, notifying state attorneys general of constitutional claims, etc. The last several decades, however, have seen a dramatic increase in interest in state constitutions. It is clearer than ever that state constitutions may be interpreted to provide more protection than the national minimum standards guaranteed in the federal Constitution.

I. THE RACE TO THE BOTTOM

The workers' compensation Race to the Bottom has been a marathon rather than a sprint. Beginning several decades ago a number of states began to amend their state statutes to reduce or limit workers' benefits in a variety of ways. The details of these steps are beyond the scope of this Article, and have been described in detail by others. Essentially, these restrictions have included a succession of limitations on the scope of, and eligibility for, workers' compensation benefits in a wide variety of circumstances. The most dramatic element is the "opt-out" possibility, long in effect in Texas, recently adopted in Oklahoma, and under consideration in other states. The opt-out option permits employers to simply decline to participate in the statutory workers' compensation program, and replace it with their own employer-developed private insurance program. These often include a few elements that are more advantageous to workers, but many more elements that work against the receipt of benefits by injured workers or the families of workers killed on the job. In a recent, exhaustive analysis of the Texas opt-out program, Stanford law professor Alison D. Morantz concluded that major employers in that state had seen reductions in their workers' compensation expenses of over forty

10. Id. at 113–34.
12. Duff, State's Authority to Opt-Out, supra note 11, at 136–37, 141.
13. Id. at 136–37.
14. Id.
percent. Professor Morantz summarizes the Texas program as relying on private plans, providing wage-replacement benefits from the first day of lost work, resulting in higher levels of employer satisfaction, including mandatory arbitration of claims, and covering workers who, for the most part, knew their employer was a nonsUBscriber before being injured. She continued:

Many other features of private plans are remarkably homogeneous. All limit employees' choice of medical care provider. None compensates permanent partial disabilities or chiropractic care. Most also categorically exclude some non-traumatic injuries (such as non-inguinal hernias, cumulative trauma if the employee has worked less than 180 days, carpal tunnel syndrome, chronic fatigue syndrome and fibromyalgia) and many occupational diseases (such as any caused by mold, fungi, pollen, or asbestos) from the scope of coverage.

She further described a number of "more discretionary grounds for denying claims or terminating benefits in particular cases." National conservative organizations are pushing for the adoption of such laws in all fifty states.

II. CONSTITUTIONALIZATION OF WORKERS' COMPENSATION

A foundational event, leading to judicial involvement in constitutional questions concerning workers' compensation, occurred in 1911 in the New York case of Ives v. South Buffalo Railway Co. This famous, or perhaps infamous, decision struck down New York's 1910 workers' compensation statute, which had been the first in the country. Notably, the New York statute had been drafted with an eye

16. Id. at 10–11.
17. Id. at 12.
20. 94 N.E. 431, 448 (N.Y. 1911).
21. Id. at 435–36, 448.
toward possible constitutional problems, to no avail. This decision caused a “political firestorm;” rendered the author of the decision, Judge William E. Werner extremely unpopular; and led in short order to a state constitutional amendment overturning the decision by specifically authorizing the enactment of workers’ compensation legislation. Although, by contrast to the federal constitution, state legislatures generally do not need grants of authority in state constitutions in order to enact laws pursuant to their reserved, plenary police-power; state constitutional amendments granting legislative authority are often utilized to overcome judicial decisions to the contrary. Dr. John Dinan refers to these amendments as “court constraining” amendments. New York’s 1913 amendment thus began the “constitutionalization” of workers’ compensation in some states. Similar state constitutional amendments were adopted in other states. Ultimately, in 1917 the Supreme Court of the United States upheld New York’s reenacted workers’ compensation statute against a federal constitutional challenge as an acceptable substitute for tort remedies—so long as that substitute did not contravene the Fourteenth Amendment. The Court stated, in a rationale worth quoting at length:

[I]t perhaps may be doubted whether the state could abolish all rights of action, on the one hand, or all defenses, on the other, without setting up something adequate in their stead. No such question is here presented, and we intimate no opinion upon it. The statute under consideration sets aside one body of rules only to establish another system in its place. If the employee is no longer able to recover as much as before in case of being

24. This is one of the major distinctions between the federal constitution and the constitutions of the states. Williams, supra note 9, at 27, 249–53.
27. Dinan, supra note 26, at 995.
28. Id.
injured through the employer's negligence, he is entitled to moderate compensation in all cases of injury, and has a certain and speedy remedy without the difficulty and expense of establishing negligence or proving the amount of damages. Instead of assuming the entire consequences of all ordinary risks of the occupation, he assumes the consequences, in excess of the scheduled compensation, of risks ordinary and extraordinary. On the other hand, if the employer is left without defense respecting the question of fault, he at the same time is assured that the recovery is limited, and that it goes directly to the relief of the designated beneficiary. And just as the employee's assumption of ordinary risks at common law presumably was taken into account in fixing the rate of wages, so the fixed responsibility of the employer, and the modified assumption of risk by the employee under the new system, presumably will be reflected in the wage scale. The act evidently is intended as a just settlement of a difficult problem, affecting one of the most important of social relations, and it is to be judged in its entirety. We have said enough to demonstrate that, in such an adjustment, the particular rules of the common law affecting the subject matter are not placed by the [Fourteenth] Amendment beyond the reach of the lawmaking power of the state, and thus we are brought to the question whether the method of compensation that is established as a substitute transcends the limits of permissible state action.\textsuperscript{30}

* * *

Viewing the entire matter, it cannot be pronounced arbitrary and unreasonable for the state to impose upon the employer the absolute duty of making a moderate and definite compensation in money to every disabled employee, or, in case of his death, to those who were entitled to look to him for support, in lieu of the common law liability confined to cases of negligence.

This, of course, is not to say that any scale of compensation, however significant, on the one hand, or onerous, on the other, would be supportable. In this case, no criticism is made on the ground that the compensation prescribed by the statute in question is unreasonable in amount, either in general or in the particular case. Any question of that kind may be met when it arises.\(^{31}\)

\textsuperscript{30} N.Y. Cent. R.R., 243 U.S. at 201-02.

The Court reaffirmed that view in 1919:

The definition of negligence, contributory negligence, and assumption of risk, the effect to be given to them, the rule of respondent superior, the imposition of liability without fault, and the exemption from liability in spite of fault—all these, as rules of conduct, are subject to legislative modification. And a plan imposing upon the employer responsibility for making compensation for disabling or fatal injuries irrespective of the question of fault, and requiring the employé to assume all risk of damages over and above the statutory schedule, when established as a reasonable substitute for the legal measure of duty and responsibility previously existing, may be made compulsory upon employés as well as employers.\(^{32}\)

Looking back on those cases now, the question arises as to whether they actually established a federal constitutional requirement of a fair quid pro quo in the tradeoff between tort remedies and workers' compensation remedies.\(^{33}\) Did the Supreme Court of the United States constitutionalize the Grand Bargain?

In addition, at the federal level there have been suggestions that opt-out programs might implicate ERISA preemption doctrine. U.S. Labor Secretary Thomas Perez said: “What opt-out programs really are all about is enabling employers to reduce benefits.”\(^{34}\) He continued that such programs “create really a pathway to poverty for people who get injured on the job.”\(^{35}\) He noted that the Labor Department was commissioning a study about cutbacks in workers' compensation, including opt-outs "to document the precise nature of this problem across the country." On October 5, 2016, the Department released its report. It concluded that the states' pattern of reducing eligibility and benefits has been intended, or at least had the effect, to shift the cost of workplace injuries onto government benefits and injured workers and their families. The report recommends serious consideration of a federal oversight role over state programs, with minimum requirements, similar to that in place for unemployment compensation. After the New York experience, other states amended their constitutions to eliminate doubts about workers' compensation statutes even before litigation challenging them. According to Dr. Dinan:

\(^{31}\) Id. at 205–06 (emphasis added).

\(^{33}\) Duff, State's Authority to Opt-Out, supra note 11, at 133, 187.

Meanwhile, other states adopted court-preempting constitutional amendments. These states acted in part out of uncertainty created by the New York court's invalidation of that state's compulsory program. Occasionally, though, these amendments were enacted because of the narrow margin of rulings handed down by other courts that sustained such acts, as in Ohio, where the state supreme court in 1912 upheld an optional program, but only by a four-two margin. Additional constitutional amendments of this sort, guaranteeing the constitutionality of worker's compensation programs, were adopted in Arizona, California, Ohio, Vermont, Wyoming, Pennsylvania, and Texas.

Still, other states have not "constitutionalized" their worker's compensation schemes, but a wide variety of other state constitutional limitations in the area of litigation concerning accidents and death can come into play. "Right to remedy" provisions, specific bans on damage caps, jury trial guarantees, and many others are relevant to defending against the Race to the Bottom. We have learned much from the "tort

36. Berkes, supra note 34.
38. Id. at 3, 6.
39. Id. at 24–25.
40. Dinan, supra note 26, at 995–96 (emphasis added) (citing State ex rel. Yaple v. Creamer, 97 N.E. 602 (Ohio 1912)).
reform” battles. Tort reform proposals include caps on damages, limitations on punitive damages, statutes of repose, mandatory alternative dispute resolution, as well as a number of other approaches.

The following is from a previous work I have written on the matter in its original form:

Interestingly, there are virtually no federal constitutional claims that arise for plaintiffs who feel aggrieved by such state legislative restrictions. It is the state constitutions, rather, that provide a wide variety of avenues of constitutional challenge. General state constitutional provisions on open courts and right to remedy, civil jury trial, due process and equal protection, and separation of powers have provided extraordinarily fertile arguments for successful constitutional challenges to tort reform measures. Also, general legislative process restrictions contained in state constitutions, such as the single-subject limit, have supported the invalidation of omnibus tort reform measures. In addition, some states’ constitutions contain specific provisions aimed directly at preserving tort remedies. For example, the Kentucky Constitution contains the following two provisions:

42. The text accompanying footnotes 43–49 is from Williams, supra note 41, at 897–99. See also id. at 897–99 nn.3–9.

The General Assembly shall have no power to limit the amount to be recovered for injuries resulting in death, or for injuries to person or property.46

Whenever the death of a person shall result from an injury inflicted by negligence or wrongful act, then, in every such case, damages may be recovered for such death, from the corporations and persons so causing the same. Until otherwise provided by law, the action to recover such damages shall in all cases be prosecuted by the personal representative of the deceased person. The General Assembly may provide how the recovery shall go and to whom belong; and until such provision is made, the same shall form part of the personal estate of the deceased person.47

The Arizona Constitution provides that “[n]o law shall be enacted in this state limiting the amount of damages to be recovered for causing the death or injury of any person.”48 The Oklahoma Constitution provides: “The defense of . . . assumption of risk shall, in all cases whatsoever, be a question of fact, and shall, at all times, be left to the jury.”49

46. KY. CONST. § 54.

47. Id. at § 241; see also Saylor v. Hall, 497 S.W.2d 218, 222–23, 225 (Ky. 1973) (refusing to bar plaintiffs’ wrongful death and personal injury claims under state statutes that impose a time limit on actions arising from negligent construction, because doing so “would violate the spirit and language of Sections 14, 54, and 241 of the Constitution of Kentucky when read together”).

49. OKLA. CONST. art. XXIII, § 6; accord Reddell v. Johnson, 942 P.2d 200, 203 (Okla. 1997) (discussing the jury mandate for assumption of risk defenses and noting that, save for only two exceptions, it is “generally required”); see also MONT. CONST. art II, § 16 (guaranteeing “full legal redress” for employment injuries); Connery v. Liberty Nw. Ins. Co., 960 P.2d 288, 290 (Mont. 1998) (discussing an insurer subrogation statute that had been ruled unconstitutional for violating this provision); Trankel v. State, 938 P.2d 614, 619, 621 (Mont. 1997) (refusing to apply a federal doctrine that shields the government
A leading case on the application of state constitutional access to court/remedy guarantees in the workers' compensation context was the Oregon Supreme Court's 2001 decision in \textit{Smothers v. Gresham Transfer, Inc.} \textsuperscript{51} There, an employee alleged that chemical mist and fumes caused him a "compensable injury," and after an administrative law judge denied the claim (as not a "major contributing cause") he filed a common law negligence action. \textsuperscript{52} The employer argued, and the trial court agreed, that even though the injury was not compensable, it was still barred by the statutory exclusive remedy provision. \textsuperscript{53} After an exhaustive analysis of Oregon's remedy guarantee, the court declared this result unconstitutional. \textsuperscript{54} More recently, however, \textit{Smothers} was overruled by the Oregon Supreme Court in \textit{Horton v. Oregon Health \\ & Science University.} \textsuperscript{55} In \textit{Horton}, both the majority and concurring opinions provided exhaustive analysis of the English origins of the right to remedy/access to court provisions, concluding that, despite evidence to the contrary, these clauses were only addressed to the judiciary and did not limit legislative modifications of the common law. \textsuperscript{56} This is a minority view and it remains to be seen if it will be influential in other states' jurisprudence, including cases concerning reduction in workers' compensation benefits.

In addition to "court constraining" and "court pre-empting" a third reason for constitutionalizing workers' compensation was that the state constitutional provisions protecting the common law remedies or jury trial rights for injury or death from legislative limitations would have stood in the way of the Grand Bargain—where workers gave up their \textsuperscript{51} 23 P.3d 333 (Or. 2001).

\textsuperscript{52} \textit{Id.} at 336.

\textsuperscript{53} \textit{Id.}; see also \textit{supra} note 8 and accompanying text.

\textsuperscript{54} \textit{Smothers}, 23 P.3d at 362.

\textsuperscript{55} 376 P.3d 998, 998 (Or. 2016).

\textsuperscript{56} \textit{Id.} at 1016--20, 1051--54.
common law rights for the promise (now becoming illusory in some states) of simplified, adequate, and certain no-fault benefits. Consequently, to clear the way for workers' compensation, many of these preexisting state constitutional provisions had to be modified. Take, as an example Article V, Section 32 of the Arkansas Constitution:

The General Assembly shall have power to enact laws prescribing the amount of compensation to be paid by employers for injuries to or death of employees, and to whom said payment shall be made. It shall have power to provide the means, methods, and forum for adjudicating claims arising under said laws, and for securing payment of same. Provided, that otherwise no law shall be enacted limiting the amount to be recovered for injuries resulting in death or for injuries to persons or property; and in case of death from such injuries the right of action shall survive, and the General Assembly shall prescribe for whose benefit such action shall be prosecuted.57

The italicized last sentence was the original common law protective provision and the first two sentences reflect the 1938 constitutional exception (approved by the voters) to permit legislative adoption of workers' compensation statutes.58 Therefore, states like Arkansas and many others had to adopt exceptions to their state constitutional protections of common law remedies to facilitate the Grand Bargain. The Arkansas Supreme Court made this distinction clear when it enforced the original provision by striking down a cap on punitive damages in a non-employment context: "The language that now precedes the original text was added in 1938 with the adoption of amendment 26 in order to confer upon the General Assembly the power to enact legislation to prescribe the amount of compensation to be paid employees for injury or death."59

57. ARK. CONST. art. V, § 32 (emphasis added); Young v. G.L. Tarlton, Contractor, Inc., 162 S.W.2d 477, 479 (Ark. 1942) (using the same language); see also PA. CONST. art. III, § 18 (requiring workers' compensation to be reasonable).
59. Bayer CropScience LP v. Schafer, 385 S.W.3d 822, 830 (Ark. 2011) (emphasis added); see also id. at 831 (quoting Stapleton v. M.D. Limbaugh Constr. Co., 969 S.W.2d 648, 653 (Ark. 1998)) ("As we have made plain, the General Assembly 'may limit tort liability only [where] there is an employment relationship between the parties.'"); Brown v. Finney, 932 S.W.2d 769 (Ark. 1996). In Finney, the majority applied the statutory exclusive remedy provision to bar a tort action by a seriously injured employee in an automobile accident caused by a "nonsupervisory" co-employee as an "arm" of the Consequently, the more recent grant of legislative authority over compensation of workplace injuries still continues to be limited by the earlier state constitutional protection of common law tort remedies from statutory restriction. In another sense, the grant of legislative competence over workplace injuries contains its own limit to the employer-employee relationship. In other states like New York, as noted earlier, judicial decisions striking down workers' compensation as violating other, more general constitutional protections like jury trial rights, had to be "overturned" by state constitutional ("court-constraining") amendments to facilitate the Grand Bargain. Thus, in both of these instances, in addition to the usual account of the Grand Bargain where workers gave up their common law remedies, they also gave up their state constitutional protection of such common law remedies. This is a more valuable "consideration" by workers than is normally recognized. In states that have constitutionalized workers' compensation, either through court-constraining or court-preempting amendments, the most obvious effect of such amendments, as pointed out by Dr. Dinan, is to empower state legislatures to enact such statutes in spite of contrary (or close-vote) judicial decisions, or in spite of doubt about such power under provisions protecting common law rights. A less obvious effect, however, might be that such amendments limit the legislature's power so that workers' compensation statutes must comport with, or fit within, the arguably limiting terms of these amendments. The best example of this "dual function" of a state constitutional workers' compensation amendment is California's article XIV, section 4. That provision, modified only in 1976, begins with an express grant of "plenary power" to the legislature (which it might have had already) to adopt a "complete system of workers' compensation" employer. Id. at 774. The dissenting justice argued that the constitutional provision only authorized the legislature to bar common law actions against "employers." Id. at 776 (Dudley, J., dissenting).

60. Stapleton, 969 S.W.2d at 652-53 ("[The statute] is unconstitutional as applied in this case because it grants tort immunity to a prime contractor even when there is no statutory employment relationship with the injured employee.") (alteration in original) (emphasis added). For a more detailed coverage of these issues under Arkansas's constitution, as well as several other state constitutions, see Justin M. Rains, Flavio Rios Guerrero v. OK Foods, Inc.: Advocating for a Broader Intentional-Tort Exception to the Workers' Compensation Exclusive-Remedy Doctrine, 61 ARK. L. REV. 133, 141-42, 151 (2009).

61. See supra notes 20-32 and accompanying text.

that must include, among other things, “adequate” compensation, “full provision” for medical benefits, and access to state appellate courts.63

Arguably, statutes purporting to deny these features would violate the California provision.64 None of the other state provisions has such a clear, apparent dual function.65 In 1972, in Mathews v. Workman’s Compensation Appeals Board, the California Supreme Court emphasized this constitutional provision’s grant of “plenary power” to the legislature to deal with workers’ compensation, and went on to interpret that “grant” as “trumping” other constitutional protections, and through “negative implication,” limiting statutes granting more workers benefits than seemingly required by the clause.66 Mathews involved a challenge to a provision in the workers’ compensation act that excluded workers who got into altercations where they were the “initial physical aggressor.”67 The claimant’s widow argued that this limitation violated the constitution’s requirement that the legislature had to make workers’ compensation available “irrespective of the fault of any party.”68 The court, however, held that this was a “misconstruction” of the constitutional language and, reviewing its history, concluded that this was a reference to eliminating the common

64. The California Courts of Appeal have seen the provision not only as a grant of legislative power, but also as a limiting function. See Six Flags, Inc. v. Workers’ Comp. Appeals Bd., 51 Cal. Rptr. 3d 377, 383–84 (Cal. Ct. App. 2006). But see Stevens v. Workers’ Comp. Appeals Bd., 194 Cal. Rptr. 3d 469, 482 (Cal. Ct. App. 2015).

65. But see ARIZ. CONST. art. XVIII, § 8.

The percentages and amounts of compensation provided in House Bill No. 227 enacted by the Seventh Legislature of the State of Arizona, shall never be reduced nor any industry included within the provision of said House Bill No. 227 eliminated except by initiated or referred measure as provided by this Constitution.

Id. This provision was added to Arizona’s Constitution in 1925 after much controversy over the original 1912 provision on workers’ compensation. The technique of “constitutionalizing” the compromise statute was upheld in Alabam’s Freight Co. v. Hunt, 242 P. 658, 661–62, 664, 666 (Ariz. 1926). See also McPeak v. Indus. Comm’n, 741 P.2d 699, 700–02 (Ariz. Ct. App. 1987); JOHN D. LESHY, THE ARIZONA STATE CONSTITUTION: A REFERENCE GUIDE 316–18 (1993). This provision in Arizona’s constitution has been interpreted to include the limiting function. In Grammatico v. Indus. Comm’n, 117 P.3d 786 (Ariz. 2005), the court interpreted article XVIII, section 8 to require “no fault” workers’ compensation, and therefore struck down statutes that barred compensation for workers who tested positive for drugs or alcohol. Id. at 792.

67. Id. at 1167.

68. Id. at 1170.
law doctrine of negligence. This was certainly not a holding that the provisions of the constitutional clause did not impose certain requirements or limitations on the nature of workers' compensation statutes, but rather that the claimant's widow relied on a mistaken reading of the limitation. The closest the court came to that idea was the following: "Furthermore, our examination of the history behind section 21, article XX indicates that the section was added to the Constitution and then amended for the sole purpose of removing all doubts as to the constitutionality of the then existing workmen's compensation statutes."70 This can in no way be interpreted as holding that there are no limits contained in the constitutional provision for future amendments to the workers' compensation statutes that do not meet the constitutional provision's requirements. The court seems to have ignored the fact that the California legislature had preexisting plenary police power that could have, barring some other state constitutional limitation, supported the enactment of a workers' compensation statute.71 Here, the constitutional specifications for workers' compensation should have been interpreted as mandatory requirements (or limitations as the case may be) on the content of workers' compensation statutes.

This 1972 California Supreme Court decision has been read by the California Court of Appeal to have trumped other state constitutional limits, including those contained in section 4 itself! That court stated, "[w]e reject appellants' contention that article XIV, section 4 contains 'line after line,' establishing enforceable rules. Article XIV, section 4 defines the workers' compensation system, and leaves it to the Legislature to enact appropriate legislation."72 This view was reiterated by the Court of Appeal in 2015: "Stevens's separation-of-powers claim fails under the state Constitution's plain terms. Under Section 4, the Legislature 'is . . . expressly vested with plenary power, unlimited by any provision of this Constitution, to create, and enforce a complete system of workers' compensation, by appropriate legislation.'"73 This more recent Court of Appeal decision was recently denied certiorari by

69. Id.
70. Id. at 1175 (referring to the earlier section number).
71. WILLIAMS, supra note 9, at 249–50.
the Supreme Court of the United States.\textsuperscript{74} This potential limiting function of state constitutional workers' compensation provisions is further explored in the discussion of Ohio cases below. Offensive political organization and action to push for the inclusion of similar limits ("positive-rights") in order to prevent the erosion of the Grand Bargain could be a productive adjunct to the more familiar defensive litigation.\textsuperscript{75}

III. SELECTED STATES

This section illustrates the possible range of litigation arguments against erosion of workers' compensation benefits in states with state constitutional provisions specifically on workers' compensation and states without such provisions. Similar arguments could be developed in other states, depending on the content of their state constitutions and the judicial doctrines surrounding them.

A. Florida

Florida continues to present a microcosm of both the erosion of the Grand Bargain through the Race to the Bottom and of state constitutional challenges attempting to block that erosion and protect the workers' part of the Bargain. Florida does not have a specific workers' compensation provision in its constitution. The original statute was adopted in 1935 without any constitutional challenge.\textsuperscript{76} Over the years the Florida Supreme Court has upheld various limitations adopted by the legislature.\textsuperscript{77} These challenges were brought, \textsuperscript{74} Stevens v. Cali. Workers' Comp. Appeals Bd., 137 S. Ct. 384 (2016).

\textsuperscript{75} Emily Zackin analyzes the various movements to protect workers' rights, including workers' compensation in Emily Zackin, Looking for Rights in All the Wrong Places: Why State Constitutions Contain America's Positive Rights 106-45 (2013). See also Amy Bridges, Democratic Beginnings 88-99, 120-124 (2015) (describing the involvement of nineteenth century labor groups in the creation of state constitutions in the west).
\textsuperscript{76} See Kluger v. White, 281 So. 2d 1, 4 (Fla. 1973).
Workmen's compensation abolished the right to sue one's employer in tort for a job-related injury, but provided adequate, sufficient, and even preferable safeguards for an employee who is injured on the job, thus satisfying one of the exceptions to the rule against abolition of the right to redress for an injury.
\textit{Id.}
\textsuperscript{77} See, e.g., Newton v. Mc Cotter Motors, Inc., 475 So. 2d 230, 230-31 (Fla. 1985) (holding a provision requiring that death must result within one year of a compensable accident or following five years of continuous disability to be eligible for death benefits did not deny access to courts); Sasso v. Ram Prop. Mgmt., 452 So. 2d 932, 933-34 (Fla. 1984) unsuccessfully, under the “access to court” or “right to remedy” provision in Florida’s Constitution. It provides: “The courts shall be open to every person for redress of any injury, and justice shall be administered without sale, denial or delay.” In 1973, the Florida Supreme Court decided Kluger v. White, a landmark case striking down a statutory no-fault automobile insurance provision that barred property damage claims below five hundred fifty dollars. The court stated:

[W]here a right of access to the courts for redress for a particular injury has been provided by statutory law predating the adoption of the Declaration of Rights of the Constitution of the State of Florida, or where such right has become a part of the common law of the State pursuant to Fla. Stat. s 2.01, F.S.A., the Legislature is without power to abolish such a right without providing a reasonable alternative to protect the rights of the people of the State to redress for injuries, unless the Legislature can show an overpowering public necessity for the abolition of such right, and no alternative method of meeting such public necessity can be shown.

This can be seen as a different, smaller, and constitutional version of the concept of the Grand Bargain. But when the legislature enacted a comprehensive revision of the workers’ compensation laws in 1989 and 1990, the Florida Supreme Court held, despite the claim that the revisions operated to “substantially reduce preexisting benefits to employees without providing any countervailing advantages,” that the amended “workers’ compensation law remains a reasonable alternative to tort litigation.” The court purported to apply the Kluger test.

(per curiam) (holding a provision which cut off wage-loss benefits at age sixty-five did not deny access to courts); Acton v. Fort Lauderdale Hosp., 440 So. 2d 1282, 1284 (Fla. 1983) (finding an amendment to workers’ compensation law which reduced benefits did not deny access to courts); Iglesia v. Floran, 394 So. 2d 994, 995–96 (Fla. 1981) (per curiam) (holding an amendment to workers’ compensation law, which repealed right to bring a lawsuit for negligence of a coworker except in a few specified cases, did not deny access to courts).

80. Kluger, 281 So. 2d at 1–5.
81. Id. at 4.
82. Martinez v. Scanlan, 582 So. 2d 1167, 1171 (Fla. 1991).
83. Id. at 1171–72.
However, the court went on to strike down the amended statutes due to a flawed legislative procedure: the state constitution's requirement that laws contain only a "single subject." The court observed:

The purpose of this constitutional prohibition against a plurality of subjects in a single legislative act is to prevent "logrolling" where a single enactment becomes a cloak for dissimilar legislation having no necessary or appropriate connection with the subject matter. The act may be as broad as the legislature chooses provided the matters included in the act have a natural or logical connection.

We agree with the trial court that chapter 90–201 violates the single subject requirement and is unconstitutional. Chapter 90–201 essentially consists of two separate subjects, i.e., workers' compensation and international trade.

Because the workers' compensation amendments were included in a bill that also dealt with international trade, the court struck down the entire act. This type of legislative procedure constitutional challenge can be effective, but, as it is a procedural rather than substantive challenge, the legislature can remedy the violation by reenacting the

---

Likewise, we reject Scanlan's claim in the instant case. Although chapter 90-201 undoubtedly reduces benefits to eligible workers, the workers' compensation law remains a reasonable alternative to tort litigation. It continues to provide injured workers with full medical care and wage-loss payments for total or partial disability regardless of fault and without the delay and uncertainty of tort litigation. Furthermore, while there are situations where an employee would be eligible for benefits under the pre-1990 workers' compensation law and now, as a result of chapter 90-201, is no longer eligible, that employee is not without a remedy. There still may remain the viable alternative of tort litigation in these instances. As to this attack, the statute passes constitutional muster.

Id.

85. Martinez, 582 So. 2d at 1172 (citing Chenoweth v. Kemp, 396 So. 2d 1122 (Fla. 1981)).

86. Martinez, 582 So. 2d at 1172–73 ("In the instant case, however, the subjects of workers' compensation and international trade are simply too dissimilar and lack the necessary logical and rational relationship to the legislature's stated purpose of comprehensive economic development to pass constitutional muster.").
statute following the proper procedure. This is exactly what happened in Florida, thus "curing" the procedural constitutional violation.

There is another important point about this type of "single-subject" challenge. An asserted violation is apparent from the face of the enacted law; it carries its "death warrant in its hand." This is also true for claims that the title of the act does not properly disclose its contents; this argument can be made simply by reference to the face of the enacted law. By contrast, other legislative procedure challenges under state constitutions, such as those alleging that the law was improperly "altered" during its passage through the legislature so as to "change its original purpose," require extrinsic evidence beyond the face of the law. In some states, such extrinsic evidence is barred by the "enrolled bill rule." In controversial areas of state legislation, such as workers' compensation "reform," legislators will be tempted to shortcut or bypass some of the state constitutional requirements for the enactment of state laws. Those resisting such "reforms" would do well to pay attention to the possibilities of such procedural challenges. Litigation in Florida has attempted, with mixed results, to challenge some of the more recent cutbacks in workers' compensation coverage. For example, Stahl v. Hialeah Hospital challenged the legislature's imposition of a ten-dollar copay for medical visits after a claimant attains maximum medical improvement, and the elimination of permanent partial disability ("PPD"). The District Court of Appeals rejected the challenge: "[w]e disagree, because both amendments withstand rational basis review, in that the copay provision furthers the legitimate stated purpose of insuring reasonable medical costs after the injured worker has reached a maximum state of medical improvement, and PPD benefits were supplanted by impairment income benefits." After initially accepting jurisdiction, the Florida Supreme Court "discharged" jurisdiction after it "considered the briefs in Stahl, heard oral arguments and . . . decided

87. WILLIAMS, supra note 9, at 275.
88. See Martinez, 582 So. 2d at 1172–73.
89. WILLIAMS, supra note 9, at 261 n.76, 267.
90. Id. at 262.
91. Id. at 263–64.
92. Id. at 263–64, 266, 268–69.
93. See, e.g., State ex rel. Ohio Acad. of Trial Lawyers v. Sheward, 715 N.E.2d 1062, 1100 (Ohio 1999); see infra note 157.
94. 160 So. 3d 519, 520 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2015) (per curiam).
95. Id.
not to consider the case." 97 Another important case that did not result in Florida Supreme Court review was State v. Florida Workers' Advocates. 98 The trial judge observed:

As of October 1, 2003, the legislature eliminated all compensation for loss of wage earning capacity that is not total in character. The last vestige of compensation for partial loss of wage earning capacity was repealed. No reasonable alternative was put in its place. Injured workers now receive permanent impairment benefits pursuant to the Florida impairment guidelines and nothing else unless the employee is permanently and totally disabled (PTD). The benefits for PTD end at age 75 or after 5 years of payment, whichever is greater. 99

The trial judge cited the landmark Kluger decision, together with a 1949 Florida Supreme Court decision, stating that the purpose of workers' compensation included "the consequences of a broken body, a diminished income, an outlay for medical and other care." 100 The judge further emphasized the "right to be rewarded for industry," which is protected by Article I, Section 2 of the Florida Constitution. 101 A 1989 Florida Supreme Court case relied on this constitutional right and applied strict scrutiny to invalidate a limitation on workers' compensation. 102 The judge continued:

The purpose of workers' compensation act is not for it to be used as a weapon in an economic civil war. Its purpose is to provide adequate compensation for on the job injuries in place of the tort remedy so as to relieve society from the costs of industrial injuries. 103

Judge Cueto therefore declared the statutory workers' compensation amendments unconstitutional, but the Third District

98. 167 So. 3d 500 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2015).
100. Id. (citing Mobile Elevator v. White, 39 So. 2d 799, 800 (Fla. 1949)).
101. Id.
Court of Appeals reversed on standing and mootness grounds,\(^{104}\) and the Florida Supreme Court denied review.\(^{105}\) It is, of course, very difficult to determine how these views would have played in the Florida appellate courts. A long-awaited decision of the Florida Supreme Court\(^{106}\) struck down a legislative limitation on workers' attorney fees (not employers') that eliminated the reasonableness standard and substituted a rigid formula.\(^{107}\) Because counsel spent over one hundred hours resisting numerous (at least twelve) defenses, but the recovery was under one thousand dollars, the fee that was awarded amounted to $1.53 per hour!\(^{108}\) In a 5-2 decision, the court declared the statute mandating this result, as a conclusive, irrebuttable presumption, unconstitutional on its face under both the state and federal due process clauses, without reaching the other state constitutional claims.\(^{109}\) The court noted that while the legislature purported to adhere to the purpose of workers' compensation as providing "the quick and efficient delivery of disability and medical benefits to an injured worker . . . in reality, the workers' compensation system has become increasingly complex to the detriment of the claimant who depends on the assistance of a competent attorney to navigate the thicket."\(^{110}\) The court noted that the claimant's right to a reasonable attorney's fee was a "critical feature" of workers' compensation, and that this is a deterrent to unreasonable resistance to claims by carriers.\(^{111}\) It held that a reasonable attorney's fee is "central" to the constitutionality of the workers' compensation law.\(^{112}\) Based on the language of the \(^{105}\) State v. Fla. Workers' Advocates, 192 So. 3d 36 (Fla. 2015) (unpublished table decision).

\(^{107}\) Castellanos v. Next Door Co., 192 So. 3d 431, 432 (Fla. 2016).

\(^{108}\) Id. at 433, 435.

\(^{109}\) Id. at 432 n.1, 448. It is puzzling that the court relied on both constitutional provisions, without any separate analysis of the different provisions. The federal ground opens up the possibility, however unlikely, of review and possible reversal by the United States Supreme Court. See Michigan v. Long, 463 U.S. 1032 (1983); Williams, supra note 9, at 122–23, 231.

\(^{110}\) Castellanos, 192 So. 3d at 434 (emphasis added); see also id. at 434 n.3 (describing the increasing complexity of workers' compensation).

\(^{111}\) Id. at 433–34.

\(^{112}\) Id. at 448. The Supreme Court of Utah struck down a restrictive fee schedule adopted by the Labor Commission, pursuant to statutory delegation, on separation of majority's opinion, it appears that the Florida court has established access to a reasonable attorney's fee for successful claims as to a constitutionally required element of the Grand Bargain.

Another important decision responded to an apparent "gap" between Florida's 104-week cap on temporary total disability benefits and the point at which a claimant reaches "maximum medical improvement" but is totally disabled.113 The employer and insurance carrier argued that the claimant was not entitled to any benefits during this interim period.114 The claimant responded that the statute should not be interpreted to require that result and that, if it was, the statute was unconstitutional as a denial of his state constitutional right to a remedy/access to court.115 Florida's First District Court of Appeals, en banc, overturned its prior precedent, avoided the constitutional question, and held that the statute was not intended to create such a gap.116 This decision, which was reversed by the Florida Supreme Court that addressed only the constitutional question, still underlines the importance of aggressive and creative statutory interpretation arguments to complement state constitutional challenges.117 Under similar circumstances, the Pennsylvania Supreme Court relied on its "policy to resolve claims on non-constitutional grounds when it is possible to do so."118 Of course, whether a statutory interpretation powers grounds. Injured Workers Assoc. of Utah v. State, 374 P.3d 14 (Utah 2016). Utah's constitution, like many others, gives their supreme court exclusive power over regulating the practice of law. See WILLIAMS, supra note 9, at 292–93. The Utah court had earlier struck down an offset for one-half a claimant's Social Security retirement benefits as age discrimination in violation of the Utah Constitution's "uniform operation of laws" clause and applied the decision retroactively. Merrill v. Utah Labor Comm'n, 223 P.3d 1099, 1103 (Utah 2009); see also Caldwell v. MACO Workers' Comp. Tr., 256 P.3d 923 (Mont. 2011) (coming to similar result under state equal protection analysis). The Kansas Supreme Court took the opposite view, reversing earlier cases, under federal and state equal protection doctrine. See Hoesli v. Triplett, Inc., 361 P.3d 594 (Kan. 2015).

114. Id. at 443–44.
115. Id.
116. Id. at 444 ("[T]he notion that there can be a period of time during which a disabled worker is not entitled to be compensated for his or her workplace injury is contrary to the basic purpose of the Workers' Compensation Law.").
117. WILLIAMS, supra note 9, at 140–41.
118. Tooey v. AK Steel Corp., 81 A.3d 851, 855, 857 (Pa. 2013) ("[W]e conclude that claims for occupational disease which manifests outside of the 300-week period prescribed by the Act do not fall within the purview of the Act, and, therefore, that the exclusivity provision of Section 303(a) does not apply to preclude an employee from filing a common law claim against an employer."); see also Johelys M. Cecala, Reconciling Latent argument is convincing is in the eye of the judicial beholder. The Florida Supreme Court took the Westphal case and reversed the District Court of Appeals on the statutory interpretation question, finding that the statute was plainly written and could not be saved under the doctrine of constitutional avoidance. The court, however, then took up the constitutional question and declared the clear statutory “gap” in benefits as violating Florida’s access to court provision as interpreted in Kluger. A challenge to the entire Florida workers’ compensation statute was raised by amicus curiae Florida Workers’ Advocates but not considered by the court. The court stated forcefully:

The “reasonable alternative” test is then the linchpin and measuring stick, and this Court has undoubtedly upheld as constitutional many limitations on workers’ compensation benefits as benefits have progressively been reduced over the years and the statutory scheme changed to the detriment of the injured worker. But, there must eventually come a “tipping point,” where the diminution of benefits becomes so significant as to constitute a denial of benefits—thus creating a constitutional violation.

The court went on to characterize the diminution in benefits as “dramatic.” By way of remedy, the court ordered a reversion to the prior statutory 260-week cap. Justice Lewis concurred, but argued for a much more far-reaching declaration of unconstitutionality. He concluded:

Where totally disabled workers can be routinely denied benefits for an indefinite period of time, and have no alternative remedy to seek compensation for their injuries, something is drastically,

---

119. See, e.g., Westphal, 122 So. 3d at 451–64 (Thomas, J., dissenting in part); id. at 465–74 (Wetherell, J., dissenting). For a case where there was no saving statutory interpretation argument, see Stapleton v. M.D. Limbaugh Constr. Co., 969 S.W.2d 648, 651–52 (Ark. 1998).

120. Westphal v. City of St. Petersburg, 194 So. 3d 311, 313–14 (Fla. 2016).

121. Id. at 315, 321–22.

122. Id. at 315 n.2.

123. Id. at 323 (first emphasis added).

124. Id. at 324.

125. Id. at 327.

126. Id. at 328–31 (Lewis, J., concurring).
fundamentally, and constitutionally wrong with the statutory scheme.\textsuperscript{127}

In April 2016, Florida’s First District Court of Appeals, relying heavily on its earlier decision in \textit{Jacobson v. Southeast Personnel Leasing, Inc.},\textsuperscript{128} struck down the statutory ban, including criminal penalties, for a claimant or any other person or entity to give an attorney’s fee or gratuity to a claimant’s lawyer.\textsuperscript{129} The court applied strict scrutiny in holding that the ban violated First Amendment free speech, association, and right to petition for redress, as well as the right to freedom of contract.\textsuperscript{130} The court noted:

Furthermore, again as in \textit{Jacobson}, an attorney’s fee paid by Claimant and her union would have no impact on workers’ compensation premiums, because Claimant and her union are the ones paying the fee, not the [Employer/Carrier ("E/C")]. If Claimant prevailed, the E/C still could not be required to pay more in fees that the Legislature allows under section 440.34, Florida Statutes, regardless of Claimant obtaining legal counsel not authorized under chapter 440, as Claimant would pay the excess fee.\textsuperscript{131}

From this progression of litigation in Florida, as a response to apparent domination of the legislature by employer and insurance carrier interests, we see that the courts were willing to tolerate quite substantial erosion of employee benefits but at some juncture saw this as exceeding the “tipping point” of the Grand Bargain. Such litigation, together with more effective legislative advocacy on behalf of workers, is going to be necessary to stem the Race to the Bottom. Notably, the Florida Constitution Revision Commission convened in 2017.\textsuperscript{132} Perhaps \textsuperscript{128} 113 So. 3d 1042 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2013).

\textsuperscript{129} Miles v. City of Edgewater Police Dep’t, 190 So. 3d 171, 174 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2016).

\textsuperscript{130} \textit{Id.} at 174, 184.

\textsuperscript{131} \textit{Id.} at 181.

a reasonable workers’ compensation provision, protecting the Grand Bargain, can be considered and proposed without legislative involvement to Florida’s voters.133

B. Ohio

The potential role of specific state constitutional provisions on workers’ compensation can be illustrated by a line of Ohio cases concerning “intentional torts” as outside the exclusive remedy provision of workers’ compensation. Even though the original workers’ compensation statute was upheld, Ohio has two clauses on workplace injuries: article II, sections 34134 and 35.135 As demonstrated by the

134. “Laws may be passed fixing and regulating the hours of labor, establishing a minimum wage, and providing for the comfort, health, safety and general welfare of all employees; and no other provision of the constitution shall impair or limit this power.” OHIO CONST. art. II, § 34 (emphasis added).

135. For the purpose of providing compensation to workmen and their dependents, for death, injuries or occupational disease, occasioned in the course of such workmen’s employment, laws may be passed establishing a state fund to be created by compulsory contribution thereto by employers, and administered by the state, determining the terms and conditions upon which payment shall be made therefrom. Such compensation shall be in lieu of all other rights to compensation, or damages, for such death, injuries, or occupational disease, and any employer who pays the premium or compensation provided by law, passed in accordance herewith, shall not be liable to respond in damages at common law or by statute for such death, injuries or occupational disease. Laws may be passed establishing a board which may be empowered to classify all occupations, according to their degree of hazard, to fix rates of contribution to such fund according to such classification, and to collect, administer and distribute such fund, and to determine all rights of claimants thereto. Such board shall set aside as a separate fund such proportion of the contributions paid by employers as in its judgment may be necessary, not to exceed one per centum thereof in any year, and so as to equalize, insofar as possible, the burden thereof, to be expended by such board in such manner as may be provided by law for the investigation and prevention of industrial accidents and diseases. Such board shall have full power and authority to hear and determine whether or not an injury, disease or death resulted because of the failure of the employer to comply with any specific requirement for the protection of the lives, health or safety of employees, enacted by the General Assembly or in the form of an order adopted by such board, and its decision shall be final; and for the purpose of such investigations and inquiries it may appoint referees. When it is found, upon hearing, that an injury, disease or death resulted because of such failure by the employer, such amount as shall be found to be just, not greater than fifty nor less than fifteen per centum of the maximum award established by law, shall be added by the board, to the amount of the compensation that may be awarded on account of such injury, disease, or death, and paid in like manner as other awards; and, if such compensation is paid from the state fund, the premium of such employer shall be increased in such amount, covering such period of time as may be fixed, as will recoup the state fund in the amount of such additional award, notwithstanding any and all other provisions in this constitution.

136. Blankenship v. Cincinnati Milacron Chems., Inc., 433 N.E.2d 572, 575–78 (Ohio 1982), superseded by statute, Ohio Rev. Code Ann. § 2745.01 (West 2012), as recognized in Houdek v. ThyssenKrupp Materials N.A., Inc., 983 N.E.2d. 1253 (Ohio 2012). The employees alleged they were injured by chemical fumes that the employer knew were dangerous and—through intentional, willful, and wanton motives—did nothing about. Blankenship, 433 N.E.2d at 574. An associated issue is whether emotional distress claims of third parties, arising out of workplace injuries or death, are “derivative” and therefore barred, or independent and not barred. See Collins v. COP Wyo., LLC, 366 P.3d 521, 527 (Wyo. 2016) (citing a collection of cases and stating that a “separate and distinct” injury “is outside the ‘grand bargain’”).

137. Id., 433 N.E.2d at 575.

138. Id. at 577.

139. Id.

beyond the reach of empowerment".\(^\text{141}\) Despite the fact that state constitutions assign plenary authority to the legislative branch, and the 1912 decision of the Ohio Supreme Court upheld the legislature's power to enact a workers' compensation law,\(^\text{142}\) the court in all of these cases up through 1999 perceived article II, sections 34 and 35 as the source of authorization for the legislature to enact workers' compensation laws. Viewed from this perspective, the provisions of sections 34 and 35 were seen as limitations on the legislature's power. In the 1999 decision Johnson v. BP Chemicals, Inc.,\(^\text{143}\) two dissenting opinions challenged that view, contending that the constitutional provisions were not actually limitations on the legislature's power to enact workers' compensation statutes, but rather the statutes challenged in that case were products of the legislature's preexisting plenary power.\(^\text{144}\)

The dissenters had identified and challenged the majority's technique of "negative implication"\(^\text{145}\) in state constitutional interpretation.\(^\text{146}\) When state constitutional provisions mandate legislative action or grant authority to a state legislature, which already has plenary power, courts can transform these apparent grants of authority into judicially created limitations on legislative power, as Professor Frank Grad and I have cautioned:

> It must be emphasized that very nearly everything that may be included in a state constitution operates as a restriction on the legislature, for both commands and prohibitions directed to other branches of the government or even to the individual citizen will operate to invalidate inconsistent legislation.

***

In constitutional theory state government is a government of plenary powers, except as limited by the state and federal constitutions. . . . In order to give effect to such special authorizations, however, courts have often given them the full \(^{141}\) Johnson v. BP Chems., Inc., 707 N.E.2d 1107, 1112, 1114 (Ohio 1999) (emphasis added); see also Brady v. Safety-Kleen Corp., 576 N.E.2d 722, 730 (Ohio 1991) (invalidating statutes using both constitutional provisions).

\(^{142}\) See supra note 40.

\(^{143}\) 707 N.E.2d 1107.

\(^{144}\) Id. at 1116 (Cook, J., dissenting); id. at 1121–22 (Lundberg Stratton, J., dissenting).

\(^{146}\) Id. at 1115–19 (Cook, J., dissenting); id. at 1120–22 (Lundberg Stratton, J., dissenting).
effect of negative implication, relying sometimes on the canon of construction expressio unius est exclusio alterius (the expression of one is the exclusion of another).

After another restrictive statute concerning employers' intentional torts was enacted, the majority of the Ohio Supreme Court adopted the view of the dissenters in Johnson. After a detailed review of intentional tort doctrine under sections 34 and 35, the court characterized article II, section 34:

as a broad grant of authority to the General Assembly, not as a limitation on its power to enact legislation. [Plaintiffs'] position would require Section 34 to be read as a limitation, in effect stating: "No law shall be passed on the subject of employee working conditions unless it furthers the comfort, health, safety and general welfare of all employees." Under that approach, however, Section 34 would prohibit all legislation imposing any burden whatsoever on employees, regardless of how beneficial to the public that legislation might be.

The court continued:

Just as Section 34, Article II is phrased as an affirmative grant of power to the General Assembly . . . . It follows that Section 35 does not forbid the legislation before us today, which affects employees' recovery for intentional torts, but not receipt of workers' compensation. Viewed from an employee's perspective, Section 35 addresses and authorizes recovery under the Workers' Compensation Act. Legislation that does not affect the recovery falls outside of any Section 35 concerns.

---

Referring to the dissenting opinions in Johnson, the court concluded that the Ohio Constitution's workers' compensation clauses did not carry a "negative implication." In a companion case, the Ohio court upheld the new intentional tort statute against state constitutional claims under the right to remedy provision, civil jury trial guarantee, due process, equal protection, and separation of powers doctrines. Notably, the court stated that both the Ohio Constitution's due process ("due course of law") and equal protection ("all political power is inherent in the people. Government is instituted for their equal protection and benefit") were "equivalent" of the differently worded, but similar, federal constitutional provisions. In dissent, Justice Pfeifer stated:

R.C. 2745.01 purports to grant employees the right to bring intentional-tort actions against their employers, but in reality defines the cause of action into oblivion. An employee may recover damages under the statute only if his employer deliberately intends to harm him. It is difficult to conjure a scenario where such a deliberate act would not constitute a crime. Are we to believe that criminally psychotic employers are really a problem that requires legislation in Ohio?

C. Oklahoma

The Oklahoma Supreme Court upheld the state's workers' compensation law in 1932. After many years of experience with workers' compensation, Oklahoma is now in the national spotlight with Florida, Texas, and a few other states. In 2013, the Oklahoma legislature repealed the prior workers' compensation statute, and replaced it with both an Administrative Workers' Compensation Act and an Employee Injury Benefit Act. These two laws were included in

151. Id. at 1085.
154. Stetter, 927 N.E. 2d at 1111.
155. Indian Territory Illuminating Oil Co. v. Davis, 9 P.2d 40, 42 (Okla. 1932).
156. See generally Coates v. Fallin, 316 P.3d 924 (Okla. 2013).
the same bill, and the second one constituted Oklahoma’s “opt-out” law. Later that year, the Oklahoma Supreme Court rejected a single-subject (“logrolling”) state constitutional challenge, holding that the two laws were sufficiently connected to pass muster under Oklahoma’s state constitutional single-subject clause.\(^\text{157}\) Two justices, however, wrote separately to suggest strongly that the opt-out statute was subject to very serious constitutional infirmities on equality and “special law” grounds.\(^\text{158}\)

Then in 2016, the Oklahoma Supreme Court considered a constitutional challenge to the Administrative Workers’ Compensation Act Provision that barred compensation for “cumulative-trauma injury” for workers who had not been employed for a continuous one hundred-eighty-day period.\(^\text{159}\) Because the employer argued that the worker was not entitled to either workers’ compensation or a common law remedy, the court declared this provision unconstitutional as a violation of Oklahoma’s due process provision.\(^\text{160}\) Noting that its due process provision “includes an equal protection element,” the court characterized the one-hundred-eighty-day threshold as an irrebuttable presumption that, although serving a legitimate state interest to avoid fraud, was too arbitrary to pass constitutional muster.\(^\text{161}\) The court stated:

When considering the articulated purpose of preventing workers’ compensation fraud, a statute creating a class of employees who are injured, in fact, with a cumulative trauma injury during the first 180 days of employment with their then current employer, and then they are conclusively placed within a class of employees who file fraudulent claims, that statutory placement is overinclusive by lumping together the innocent with the guilty. On the other hand, if one of the purposes of workers’ compensation is to provide statutory compensation for \(^{157}\) Id. at 924–25. Oklahoma’s single-subject clause is OKLA. CONST. art. V, § 57.

\(^{158}\) Coates, 316 P.3d at 925, 929 (Combs, C.J., concurring); see OKLA. Const. art. V, § 46 (“The Legislature shall not, except as otherwise provided in this Constitution, pass any local or special law authorizing: ... Regulating the practice or jurisdiction of, or changing the rules of evidence in judicial proceedings or inquiry before the courts, justices of the peace, sheriffs, commissioners, arbitrators, or other tribunals, or providing or changing the methods for the collection of debts, or the enforcement of judgments or prescribing the effect of judicial sales of real estate[,]”). For special law provisions in state constitutions, see WILLIAMS, supra note 9, at 277–79.

\(^{159}\) Torres v. Seaboard Foods, LLC, 373 P.3d 1057, 1062 (Okla. 2016).

\(^{160}\) Id. at 1079; see also OKLA. CONST. art. II, § 7.

\(^{161}\) Torres, 373 P.3d at 1074–75, 1078.
employees actually suffering an injury arising out of the course and scope of employment; then the statute is underinclusive because it fails to include employees actually injured during the first 180 days of employment.162

Next, the court addressed a broadside attack that "forty-two (42) provisions of the current workers' compensation scheme" in Oklahoma violated the grand bargain.163 "Employee argues that when the workers' compensation statutes were originally created in several States a grand bargain was created."164 The court, however, did not view these claims as properly raised in this litigation and saw this challenge as a "hypothetical question whose judicial resolution in this appeal would not, under the present record on appeal, alter her rights on remand."165 Several justices, although concurring, wrote separately to describe access-to-court and equal protection infirmities in the current workers' compensation scheme.166 Also in 2016, in a decision with national implications, the Oklahoma Supreme Court declared the "opt-out" law unconstitutional as violating the state constitution's ban on "special laws."167 The court noted:

Rather than providing employees of qualified plan employers equal rights with those of employees falling within the Workers' Compensation Act, the clear, concise, unmistakeable [sic], and mandatory language of the Opt Out Act provides that, absent the Act's express incorporation of some standard, such employers are not bound by any provision of the Workers' Compensation Act for the purpose of: defining covered injuries; medical management; dispute resolution or other process; funding; notices; or penalties. The statutory language itself demonstrates that injured workers under the Opt Out Act have no protection to the coverage, process, or procedure afforded their fellow employees falling under the Administrative Workers' Compensation Act. There is little question that §203 specifically allows the employers creating their own plans to include conditions for recovery making it more difficult for the

162. Id. at 1078 (footnote omitted).
163. Id. at 1079.
164. Id.
165. Id. at 1081.
166. Id. at 1081–84.
injured employee falling within to recover for a work-related injury than a counterpart covered by the Administrative Act.168

IV. MAJORITARIAN JUDICIAL REVIEW

Looking at litigation concerning workers’ compensation from the federal constitutional vantage point, it may simply look like “economic regulation” which deserves the lowest level of judicial scrutiny.169 State courts, however, never rejected the Lochner era approach and have continued a much more rigorous analysis of state economic regulation.170 The focus of much of this judicial review is on “special interest” or “rent seeking” state statutes, that work against the rights of the majority.171 The workers’ compensation statutes involved in the “Race to the Bottom” could be viewed in this light, and therefore judicial review and constitutional scrutiny could serve majoritarian protection. As the editors of the Harvard Law Review noted, in the context of “tort reform” litigation:

Both courts and commentators have largely ignored the possibility that judicial review might play a radically different role—that of safeguarding the interests of majorities. State constitutional law could be dramatically divorced from its federal counterpart if state courts were to re-conceive their purpose in terms of elaborating and employing a theory of majoritarian, rather than antimajoritarian, review. In fact,

168. Id. at 773 (emphasis added); see also Maxwell v. Sprint PCS, 369 P.3d 1079, 1082 (Okla. 2016) (holding the deferral of permanent partial disability payments to workers who return to work, under the Administrative Workers’ Compensation Act, is a due process violation under article 2, section 7 of the state constitution and is an unconstitutional special law under article 5, section 59).

there is reason to believe that state courts already have undertaken something very much like this change of direction in one area: the review of economic regulation.172

A state constitutional argument challenging a special-interest statute reducing workers' compensation benefits with no corresponding benefit ("majoritarian" judicial review) could certainly appeal to a judge or judges who might not be inclined to strong enforcement of negative constitutional rights to protect unpopular minorities. This is apparent in much of the "Tort Reform" litigation. Of course, we have seen a very significant increase in powerful economic interests' involvement in state supreme court election and appointment processes as a result of state constitutional "Tort Reform" and same-sex marriage litigation.173 Their dominance in state legislatures has been refocused on state courts. This has resulted in a threat to state judicial independence.174 Neal Devins has provided an exhaustive analysis of state supreme court justices' considerations in controversial state constitutional litigation.175 Some of these may, of course, be applicable to the types of litigation described in this article.

V. HORIZONTAL FEDERALISM

When state courts engage in judicial review, interpreting their own constitutions, they may also—unlike federal constitutional law—look to the decisions of other state courts interpreting identical or similar state constitutional provisions. This is referred to as "horizontal federalism."176 This can be contrasted with the vertical approach, where state courts look to federal and United States Supreme Court decisions interpreting identical or similar federal constitutional provisions.177 Therefore, the judicial decisions enforcing the Grand Bargain pursuant to state constitutional provisions, in states like Florida, Oklahoma, California, and Ohio may be of special importance to similar litigation in other states.

VI. INTERNATIONAL HUMAN RIGHTS NORMS

I have pointed out elsewhere:

Despite the controversy over the use of international law in federal constitutional interpretation, state constitutional interpretation has, and is likely to continue to, refer to international law in certain contexts. For example, in interpreting the Oregon provision banning “unnecessary rigor” in the treatment of prisoners, Justice Hans Linde referred to international law norms. The West Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals cited the Universal Declaration of Human Rights in its state constitutional school funding decision. There is a growing literature on this important technique of interpretation.178

Pursuant to this little-known approach, international human rights documents, even if they are not binding treaties and therefore do not carry the force of federal law, can have persuasive weight in interpreting state constitutional provisions. Possibly, there are such instruments that could be relevant to the kind of litigation described herein. Further, as noted above, there is an expanding literature on this technique of interpretation.179

CONCLUSION

It is possible to view the specific state constitutional provisions on workers' compensation as "positive rights."180 Helen Hershkoff has noted the tendency of state courts unjustifiably to import federal rational basis analysis into state constitutional interpretation of 178. Id. at 355 (footnotes omitted).

180. ZACKIN, supra note 75, at 109.
positive rights. She argues that state courts should apply "rigorous scrutiny to determine whether the provision is likely to effectuate the constitutional goal." In an exhaustively-researched article, Judith Resnik contends that right-to-remedy and access-to-court guarantees constitute a positive entitlement owed by state governments to litigants in need of this government service. This approach could cause state courts, like those in California and Ohio as well as others, to be more skeptical of erosion of workers' compensation benefits based on the specifics of their own constitutions. Of course, the specifics of a statutory Grand Bargain cannot bind future legislatures. This underlines the importance of constitutional analyses of the statutes constituting the Race to the Bottom. Whether based on more general right to remedy/access to court provisions, due process and equality, separation of powers provisions, or on the more specific court-constraining or court-preempting workers' compensation provisions, state constitutions may provide potent checks to block the Race to the Bottom. This area of legislative erosion of workers' compensation benefits and the resulting state (and possibly federal) constitutional litigation presents a fast-developing area of the law. Given the national conservative groups that are pushing the Race to the Bottom it is very likely to continue for some time. Hopefully this preliminary, and admittedly limited, survey of the state constitutional landscape will contribute to this very important body of law.

182. Id. at 1184.
184. WILLIAMS, supra note 9, at 254.